"Never, never," she protested. "A man with such a heavenly expression couldn't content himself with money getting. His aim in life is higher than that."

"Maybe," said the husband as he began the perusal of the morning paper. At the next street-crossing where the train stopped an inquisitive, farmer-looking sort of a fellow took a seat beside the man with the noble, expansive brow and was soon plying him with questions. Among other things he asked him his vocation. There was one interested listener who held her breath to catch the reply.

"I keep a saloon and a meat shop. My wife sells heer and I do my own butchering."
